Video-based technology is being used extensively in occupational therapy. However, the impact of its use remains unclear. A randomized controlled trial (RCT) was undertaken to compare the outcomes of a trial of computer-assisted video-based teaching (CAVT) with a traditional video-based teaching (TVT) programme. A purposive sample of 58 students were recruited from three undergraduate occupational therapy courses (year 3-6) at the University of Otago, New Zealand. A RCT was undertaken. Participants were randomized to a CAVT group or a TVT group and taught a video-based intervention (complex occupational therapy task, COPE) in a mixed-methods format: either a CAVT-computer-assisted programme followed by a video-based TVT programme or a TVT-computer-assisted programme followed by a video-based TVT programme. Post-programme tests were conducted to measure gains in the knowledge and skills needed to perform the complex occupational therapy task. Post-programme interviews were conducted with the participants to measure their perceptions of the programme. There were no significant differences in the knowledge and skills scores of the two groups after the intervention or at follow-up. However, the CAVT-computer-assisted group reported that they had enjoyed the course more. This RCT did not find an advantage for using CAVT in an occupational therapy programme. In contrast, the CAVT-computer-assisted group enjoyed the course more. However, the study may have been underpowered to detect statistically significant differences. February 28, 2008 Falling in love with a boy- the innocent type My friend Sanjana, has been having a tough time recently. She had a "crazy" period, which included a crazy weight gain of about 15 kg in just a month. She had worked really hard in the last few weeks at the gym and had lost a lot of weight, but to no avail. The problem was, Sanjana had 82157476af
